PERFORMANCE UPDATE

After financial markets attempted to digest the impact of the military conflict in Iran in March, April saw a shift towards treating geopolitical uncertainty as the new normal. Despite ongoing unpredictability regarding the duration and consequences of the conflict, markets appear to reflect optimism that the economic impact will remain limited. This resulted in a relief rally of more than 5% across most major markets. Whether this optimism proves justified remains to be seen.

Citadel performed very well in April, delivering a return of +6.6% for the month. The Fund's year-to-date return increased to +9.9%. The largest contributors during the month were Samsung Electronics (+40%) and Sumco (+49%), while Kering (-9%) and Pronexus (-6%) were the main detractors. Since inception, Citadel has delivered a cumulative return of 234%.

PORTFOLIO NEWS

April is typically a busy month for quarterly results announcements. Samsung Electronics, currently the Fund's largest holding, reported outstanding first-quarter results, driven by record performance in its memory business. To illustrate the scale, the company's operating profit in the first quarter exceeded its full-year profit for 2018, previously Samsung's strongest year on record. With management guiding towards further revenue growth in the coming quarters, it appears highly likely that Samsung's 2026 profits will surpass those of most other technology companies. Relative to many peers, Samsung still appears remarkably cheap, trading at 3x EV/EBITA with a 24% free cash flow yield.

Kering, a luxury fashion group, reported quarterly results slightly below expectations. We expect performance to improve gradually, although it will take time for management to turn around its core Gucci brand. The new CEO has outlined a revised strategic direction, focusing on operational synergies and a greater emphasis on high-end segments such as jewellery. This approach is sensible but will require strong operational execution.
